The Journal of Racial and Ethnic Health Disparities (JREHD), an official journal of the Cobb-NMA Health Institute, issues a call for manuscripts that reflect the scholarly work to understand, intervene, address, and ultimately eliminate health disparities based upon race and ethnicity. Efforts to explore underlying causes of health disparities and to describe interventions that have been undertaken to address health disparities are featured. We welcome ongoing studies, those based on long-term data and case studies that facilitate the development of evidence-based best practices in eliminating health disparities. JREHD looks for original articles or research demonstrating innovative approaches to problems of health disparities. We invite timely and relevant systematic reviews highlighting effectiveness and critical analysis of interventions, research and policies implemented to date.

The Journal of Racial and Ethnic Health Disparities recognizes that understanding the underpinnings of health disparities requires scholarly work that takes a broad perspective on health and health care; from the individual to the community; from health care delivery to health care policy. Consequently, submissions are not limited to specific themes or study sections. Manuscripts published in JREHD will share the common theme of advancing the dialogue, research and policy changes that contribute to the elimination of health disparities. Volume 1 Issue 1 is planned for March 2014.
