Mental Health, Social Mirror

W. R. Avison, J. D. McLeod, B. A. Pescosolido (Eds)

While mental health figured prominently in the writings of classical sociologists, contemporary sociologists often view research on mental health as peripheral to the “real work” of the discipline. The essays in this volume reassert the centrality of mental health research in sociology. First, they articulate contributions that mental health research has made and can make to resolving key theoretical and empirical debates in important areas of sociological study.

The Biology of Happiness

B. Grinde

The briefs presents a model for happiness based on current knowledge in evolutionary biology and neurobiology. Briefly, the primary purpose of nervous systems is to direct an animal toward behaviour relevant for survival and procreation. In primitive animals actions are based on reflexes, while in humans the modules directing behaviour engage positive and negative affect (good and bad feelings), and they are swayed by cognitive processes. The reason why evolution opted for this strategy was the improved flexibility in response – 1.

Mayoral Control of the New York City Schools
D. Rogers

The New York City public school system has fundamentally changed its governance four times during the past forty years. It moved in 1970 from a highly centralized bureaucracy to a more community-based decentralized system, both of which were independent of the mayor. In 2002 under mayoral control, the system again centralized and then in 2007 decentralized. In each instance, New York has been an example (for good and bad) that many other large cities follow.
