Clinical and Experimental Medicine
defines the scope of the journal's content and the types of articles it considers for publication. The journal focuses on clinical and experimental work in fields such as clinical chemistry, hematology, immunology, oncology, and virology. It prioritize clarity, experimental soundness, and contributions to knowledge. The types of articles considered include invited or unsolicited reviews, editorials, original papers, short communications, and letters to the editor. Case reports, clinical trials, and epidemiological studies are not encouraged. The journal also considers monothematic issues and supplements devoted to congress proceedings.

The journal's impact factor for 2017 is 2.787. On the journal's homepage at springer.com, readers can sign up for table of contents alerts, get to know the complete editorial board, and find submission information.