Prehistorical Economics

From African Origins to Early States

- - First comprehensive overview of economic prehistory written by an economist
- - Spans the time interval from the biological origins of our species to the appearance of written documents (and thus economic history proper)
- - Makes extensive use of research from other fields such as archaeology, anthropology, genetics, and political science

This textbook outlines the political economy of prehistorical human societies during the period 200,000-5,000 BP. Although this era in human history has not been studied much by social scientists, it includes some of the defining moments of mankind such as the origin of homo sapiens in East Africa, the settling of Africa, Asia, Europe and America, the revolutionary shift to sedentary agriculture and the associated emergence of civilization with states, kings, cities, codified language, and large-scale public goods. Arguably, most of the characteristics that define modern humans emerged in the period before recorded history. This book will serve as the first scholarly reference for understanding prehistorical economies and will be of value to students in economic history, economic development, history, political economy and anthropology.
